

Building political cohesion in worker co-operative & social solidarity organisations:

a study on approaches to ecology in Catalunya

SEAN FARMELO / BIRMINGHAM CITY UNIVERSITY

Agency in the Eco-social transition

Research Question: How do worker cooperatives form strategies collaboratively in order to address the combined challenges of degrowth and the need to produce value?

Key terms: Degrowth, ESS, Worker control

Cooperatives de Treball (l'FCTC)

Case study

Worker control important element of degrowth policy suggestions. Theory development primary location in Catalunya means l'FCTC key candidate for understanding self directed strategy development.

Standing in interrelation l'FCTC composed of 655 workers cooperatives. It forms part of a complex ecosystem of organisations which enable the cooperative movement to develop strategies. The vast majority of coops are expanding or recently founded. Secondary networks and incubators supporting development.

Journey towards addressing social issues

Participants explained that members of the federation have campaigned internally for a move from a focus on legislation and services with rigid structure to be more open since the 2011 movement of the squares and rise of new cooperativism in the region.

Data Collection

Study parameters

- The study focuses on worker cooperatives who are actively interested and engaged in planning processes around degrowth and eco-social transition
- I'FCTC chosen for breadth of interview subjects, but additional interviews outside Catalunya carried out for instance in the bicycle industry

Duration and scope

- Four visits, total of half a year
- Limitations around coops spare time and language mitigated by returning in quiet period of the year and provision of translation
- Interviews of around one hour and reflections written where interviews weren't appropriate or of events.

Cooperatives and industries

- Worker cooperatives in green industries
- Snowball sampling, interviewees making recommendation of key actors, coops and networks
- Multistakeholder cooperatives with significant worker control
- Geographical spread across region

Levels and access

- Shared goals with cooperatives around research questions
- Access made possible through my position as a participant of cooperative networks and a worker cooperative in the U.K
- Interviews with members of key cooperatives in ecosystem development

Interviews made clear complex web of relations between federations and networks

Results

Coding

- Interviews transcribed and translated
- Interviews are being analysed using FOSS qualitative data programme QualCoder.
- Theme codebook created to interpret data in relation to research questions

Themes

- Interview data, associated documentation and the codebook of themes will be used to build a narrative in response to my research questions. Initial findings show
- Worker cooperatives are key component of practical development of degrowth initiatives in the region.
- Development primarily happens in cooperative ecosystems. This is how scale is achieved. Partially contingent on supportive legislative environment.

Extension

- The study focuses on worker cooperatives who are actively interested and engaged in planning processes around degrowth and eco-social transition. Final interviews could delve more into how having this core driving cooperative strategy affects other actors.
- Role of certain ecological consultancy cooperatives and XES staff could be explored.
- Placement of Catalan developments in international context such as GKN workers more neutral approaches like SDG's.

Next steps

Beyond research how can cooperatives be part of the eco-social transition?

Them

Futurs Imposible

- With XES the forum is hosting regular regional visioning sessions in smaller towns and rural areas across the region.
- The forum spurred the formation of Catalan assembly for eco-social transition as ongoing nexus of strategy
- CGT Union creating report on necessary steps to transform all sectors of economy.

Us

workers.coop

- U.K federation of workers cooperatives recommend to develop shared ecological approach, and supporting ecosystems.
- Concept of ESS being dominated by Social Enterprise means lack of distinction between systemic approach and standard corporate responses.
